Expanding ESL, Civics, and Citizenship Education in Your Community

A Start-Up Guide

Many community, faith-based, and civic organizations and employers would like to help immigrants adjust to life in the United States and prepare for citizenship, but do not know where to begin. Fortunately, the experience and practices of existing English as a second language (ESL), civics, and citizenship programs for immigrants can help you get started. This guide offers suggestions and strategies gleaned from such programs, providing a framework you can adapt to suit your community's needs and circumstances.

This guide outlines a start-up process of gathering relevant information and resources to help you develop and sustain your program, recruit and train volunteers, and recruit students. It also includes basic recommendations and sample forms and materials to help you start your program.

This guide is not intended to be a curriculum. Curricula and teaching guidelines can be found through adult education publishers, local community colleges, and other Internet websites.

Using this guide to establish your program can help you offer a rewarding and important service to immigrants and your community.

TOPICS IN THIS GUIDE INCLUDE:

► Gathering Information and Basic Resources

► Program Design and Structure

► Staffing and Resources

► Marketing Your Program to Students

► Program Content and Instruction

► Program Development

Gathering Information and Basic Resources

Determining Community Needs

Part of starting a program is assessing the needs of your community and exploring the resources already available. If you are considering starting a program, it is likely you already know people in need of English language instruction at your place of worship, at your job, or in your neighborhood. However, there are ways to learn more about the needs of your community.

Gathering Information

You can contact community organizations and adult education programs currently providing services to immigrants to determine what ESL and civics/citizenship programming already exists in your community or nearby. Links such as https://my.uscis.gov/findaclass can help you locate community organizations funded by USCIS grants currently providing services in your area. This can help you learn about the level of unmet demand for English and civics/citizenship classes. For example, you may discover there is a local Mutual Assistance Association[1] that has a waiting list of people your program might help.

Meeting the Need

As you learn about existing programs in your area, you may find that your program could supplement services offered by other organizations. Partnerships with other organizations can enable you to offer additional support services to your students or to gather teaching materials and ideas from more experienced programs. If you find that there are few or no services of the kind you want to offer, your program can fill that gap.

[1]Mutual Assistance Associations, or MAAs, are community-based organizations managed primarily by and providing services to members of specific resettled refugee groups. These organizations can provide relevant information about specific ethnic groups, language groups, and cultures.

Program Design and Structure

Setting the Course for Your Program

Successful programs share several common elements, including creating a welcoming and participating environment for students and providing high-quality instruction. These programs help immigrants improve their English language ability so they can participate more fully in American life. Helping students learn to navigate America's many complex systems and to understand American culture will help them establish a new life in this country.

Assessing Your Resources

As you evaluate the services provided at your workplace or by community and faith-based organizations, resource centers, colleges, and libraries, keep in mind that existing programs may be able to assist with your start-up. You may discover you are surrounded by organizations with staff members who have teaching backgrounds, volunteer experience, or nonprofit coordination expertise. Consider a partnership as a way to supplement your program. Local programs can combine their services, such as meeting spaces, intake services, staff/interns/volunteers, transportation, childcare, and instruction, resulting in the ability to offer more concentrated services to the community.

Selecting the Target Audience

Consider the needs of all ages as you decide who will be your target group—adults, parents and children, seniors, refugees, etc.

Finding a Site

There are a variety of options for classroom space. You might consider such places as community centers, places of worship, libraries, local public schools, community college classrooms, and businesses (for example, a local company may offer a conference room). Accessibility for students and volunteers, including a safe and handicap accessible location, will increase participation. A site near public transportation or the availability of private transportation such as a van or carpool can help facilitate attendance. Although not always feasible, finding a space designated specifically for your class is a good idea. This can foster a more personal and welcoming classroom setting. Students' ages and the types of activities you provide will determine the kinds of tables, chairs, and instructional equipment you need. A white board/chalk board, computers, DVD and CD players, and a secure place for teachers to store books, files, and teaching materials can enhance the learning environment.

Establishing a Program Framework and Mission[2]

Setting a clear program framework and objectives will provide structure and guidance for your program. Writing a mission statement for your program can help others understand its purpose. Identify how your program will be structured and supported by staff members. Each program is unique, but some elements common to most programs offering ESL and civics/citizenship instruction include:

- Providing English language instruction, including a civics and history component, to adult immigrants and refugees.

- Providing information to help immigrant families navigate American systems (such as schools, healthcare, government agencies, etc.).

- Helping eligible permanent residents prepare for U.S. citizenship.

Once you establish the framework for your program, you can outline specific plans and objectives for reaching those goals. Some sample objectives may include:

- We will name a program director and develop a staffing structure/plan.

- We will form a program planning committee by [date].

- We will create a program development plan by [date]. (This document will evolve over time.) You can tailor the sample program development plans on pages 24 and 25 to meet your program needs.

- We will approach two partner agencies to collaborate with us by [date].

- We will secure program resources (books, reference materials, etc.).

- We will recruit 15 volunteers by [date].

- We will train 10 volunteers by [date].

- We will recruit 30 students by [date].

- We will enroll 15 students by [date].

- We will start classes on [date].

Program Structure and Instruction

The instruction schedule you choose can vary, including morning, afternoon, or evening classes, weekend classes, and classes held several days in a row or daily each week. It is important to take into account work schedules, family obligations, childcare, and transportation needs as you develop a class schedule. You can tailor the sample class schedule on page 26 to meet your program needs.

Class Size

You may choose to offer instruction in a variety of formats, including one-on-one tutoring, small groups, or large classes. The number of teachers, volunteers, and students; students' English ability levels; and available space are factors to consider in deciding what type of instruction to offer. One-on-one tutoring matches one volunteer with one student. Small groups usually have two to six students. Large classes can have 20 or more students.

Instructional Approach

The number of teachers that your program needs will depend on the number of students, type of class, and teaching style you believe will best meet the needs of the students. One option, team teaching, usually involves two teachers providing instruction to a large class. This structure allows teachers to break a large class into smaller groups based on ability level. In some team teaching environments, teachers alternate teaching days with the same class. This structure also enables teachers to support one another in planning and teaching and reduces the need for substitute teachers.

Another approach may involve one-on-one tutoring with a teacher or volunteer.

Enrollment Options

You may find that classes that have a fee associated with them have a better retention rate. However, class fees generally do not sustain a program, but rather encourage students to commit to the class/program. Open-entry/open-exit programs allow students to enroll in class at any point during the year and withdraw when they have met their individual learning goals. One advantage of this structure is that students need not wait until the next term to begin classes. This helps avoid problems associated with delaying enrollment, such as students' loss of interest and motivation.

Setting enrollment cycles or terms is an alternative that can provide predictability and continuity for both students and teachers. You may want to provide four- to seven-week cycles, during which all students begin and end instruction at the same time. Some programs operate on a semester system. You can decide how many weeks of classes to hold in a session based on how many units you will be teaching. While there are a variety of program designs, in federally funded adult ESL programs, 50 hours of instruction is typically used as the benchmark in determining if students have improved their skills.

Staffing and Resources

Finding and Supporting Your Volunteers

Volunteer Positions

Volunteers can participate in many ways. Let prospective volunteers know what type of help you are seeking and match their interests with your program needs. You may need:

- Teachers
- Administrative personnel
- Program coordinator
- One-on-one tutors
- Classroom tutors
- Conversation group leaders
- Conversation partners
- Workshop leaders or trainers
- Curriculum developers
- Mentors/coaches
- Childcare providers

Volunteer Job Descriptions

Once you have an idea of the kinds of positions necessary for your program, you can develop volunteer job descriptions stating the qualifications and time commitments for tutors and other volunteer positions. It will help to specify the qualifications you are looking for in your program volunteers, such as fluency in English, writing skills, a high school diploma or GED, college degree, etc. You may have different requirements for different positions. For example, a good tutor or teacher does not necessarily need advanced education. Volunteer tutoring usually requires time to prepare lessons in addition to classroom teaching hours, so when volunteers are deciding how much time they can devote, they need to understand the schedule requirements. You can tailor the sample volunteer position description on page 27 to meet your program needs. A signed agreement or contract outlining your expectations of volunteers and the work they will perform can help clarify the time and effort involved. Limiting the length of the commitment period may help encourage a volunteer to sign up initially. You can tailor the sample agreement on page 28 to meet your program needs.

Volunteer Tutor Recruitment

Once you determine the volunteers and skills your program needs to operate, you can recruit volunteers with those skills. You may already know people who are interested in volunteering to teach English to adult immigrants and their families or helping meet other program needs. If you have not yet identified volunteers, there are many ways to begin recruiting efforts.

Nonprofit program participants may be willing to give back to the community. Check with local programs for referrals. Word-of-mouth referrals of your program can help raise awareness, as can having your program director or coordinator speak at community events. You can post flyers on community bulletin boards or ask local businesses to post them in their buildings. You may also consider placing notices in local English language and non-English language newspapers to attract both native English speakers and multilingual individuals who would like to help people who speak the same language.

You may want to post messages on online bulletin boards to solicit volunteer help. See if you can advertise your volunteer tutoring opportunities in the newsletters produced by places of worship or other organizations. Additionally, you may want to consider hosting an outreach table if your community holds volunteer activity fairs.

Consider contacting local undergraduate and graduate programs in TESOL (Teachers of English to Speakers of Other Languages), as these and other education programs often have students who are seeking hands-on teaching experience. These students may want to volunteer or serve as teaching interns. Retired professionals can also serve as excellent volunteers because they often have a variety of skills and more flexible schedules.

Across the country, many literacy and adult education coalitions offer technical assistance and support to volunteer programs. For example, ProLiteracy Worldwide supports literacy programs nationwide, accredits volunteer literacy programs, and maintains databases and contacts with adult education providers across the United States. Using literacy and adult coalitions can be a source of volunteers and other resources for your program.

If you notify both local and national volunteer clearinghouses that you are seeking tutors or teachers, these organizations may be able to post a notice in their online and print publications.

In addition, you can list your opportunities at serve.gov. This website promotes volunteer service in America by partnering with national service programs and helping to connect individuals with volunteer opportunities. This is one of the largest volunteer service databases in the country and would serve as an excellent starting point for posting your volunteer opportunities.

Introducing the Program to Volunteers

You may wish to create a simple brochure or document outlining the purpose, objectives, and organizational structure of your program. This material will be helpful not only in volunteer recruitment, but also in your overall outreach efforts.

Volunteer Screening and Selection

Interviewing volunteers will help build a high-quality program. Volunteer tutors should be willing to learn and develop teaching skills and should be flexible in trying new strategies to address student needs and learning styles. Remember, you are not required to accept every potential volunteer into your program.

Potential volunteers can come from a variety of backgrounds. Volunteers do not need to speak languages other than English to teach in your program, but it may be helpful if they do. Such volunteers will be able to communicate with students with limited English comprehension and may understand the challenges of learning a new language. Volunteers are also not required to have a background in teaching. This experience would be beneficial, especially for teacher training opportunities, but should not be an absolute requirement.

Volunteer Orientation

Once your recruitment efforts spark interest in your program, you can hold an information session for prospective volunteers. You can discuss the mission of your program, expectations for volunteers, how they will be evaluated, time commitments, policies and procedures, and the types of support they will receive. Orientations can be conducted individually or in group sessions.

Background information describing the program and introducing prospective volunteers to the staff and students is helpful in enabling prospective volunteers to decide if they want to make a commitment to your program. Identifying the roles of staff members and structure of your program will help volunteers have a better understanding of how your program works.

Volunteer Support and Tutor Training

All volunteers, including those with prior teaching experience, need support so they can develop as instructors and best contribute to your program. Community partnerships can be very helpful at this point. Experienced groups that have designed and conducted volunteer training programs may be helpful to your ESL and civics/citizenship program.

Local Resources

If there is a literacy coalition near you, you can contact the organization and ask what type of training resources it offers to both volunteer and professional staff. Some local coalitions not only support existing programs with training and resources, but also provide tools and technical support to fledgling volunteer programs. They may offer online resources on instructional methods as well.

National Resources

USCIS has developed a variety of training and technical resources to support volunteers and adult educators. These include:

- Adult Citizenship Education Strategies for Volunteers: These training modules are designed to provide volunteers with a basic understanding of adult second language acquisition and the naturalization process, including the interview and test: uscis.gov/citizenship/volunteer-training.

- Training Seminars: Free professional development opportunities, convened by USCIS, to help refine skills and prepare volunteers and adult educators for teaching U.S. history, civics, and the naturalization process to immigrant students. Visit uscis.gov/teachertraining for more information.

Other organizations providing training and professional development resources for volunteers and adult educators include:

- Outreach and Technical Assistance Network: otan.dni.us

- Center for Adult English Language Acquisition: cal.org/caela

- ProLiteracy Worldwide: proliteracy.org

See the sample volunteer and student intake and placement steps on page 29 as a guideline for initiating volunteers.

Marketing Your Program to Students

Getting Students Involved

Student Recruitment

There are several ways to help advertise your program to prospective students. It is important to remember that recruitment is an ongoing process. Give your program sufficient time to recruit enough students to meet your program's goals.

Flyers

You can design a flyer with program information and post

it in the neighborhood near the location where you plan to hold classes (in both English and other common languages spoken in your community). A free option is using billboards or displays in areas with heavy foot-traffic, such as on public transportation or at public transportation stops. Place flyers in stores frequented by immigrants, or ask businesses that cater to non-English-speaking customers if they would place your flyers in their shopping bags or on a bulletin board. Consider contacting local schools to see if it is possible to post flyers in their offices. Other places to consider are places of worship and community organizations. Also, local businesses may be willing to place notices in paycheck envelopes or other employee correspondence to inform employees and their family members of your program.

Presentations

Ask local schools if you can give a presentation at open houses to inform parents about your program. You can contact places of worship and ask if it would be possible to give a presentation or place an announcement in the newsletter or weekly announcements. Many community organizations hold fairs and bazaars during which representatives from community groups speak and disseminate information about the services they offer. You can find out when these events are scheduled and take the opportunity to introduce your program.

Media

Many communities have ethnic newspapers targeted at specific populations. You may be able to place translated advertisements in these newspapers or list your program's information in the "Classifieds" section. Local radio stations may be willing to place short public service announcements (PSAs) about your program. If possible, translate each advertisement or PSA into the language commonly spoken in the local community.

Referrals

Notify other service organizations in the community, such as social service offices, food banks, or housing authorities, about your classes so that the staff there can refer their clients to your program.

Online

You may wish to post your program information on electronic bulletin boards and community websites. While many prospective learners may not be searching the Internet, their friends and relatives may share what they learn about your program.

Word of Mouth

A powerful recruitment tool is a recommendation by a satisfied student. You can encourage current and former students to help in your recruitment efforts. Also, encourage your volunteers to mention the program to their colleagues, friends, and neighbors in the community.

Student Registration and Orientation

Potential students may be unfamiliar with the types of classes offered, the structure of the organization, or the various teaching methods used in your program. Below are several suggestions to help explain the enrollment process.

Intake and Registration

It can help if program staff meet one-on-one with prospective students to fill out intake paperwork and obtain relevant contact and background information. You can include personal, educational, and employment goals, learning interests, special needs, and schedule availability. You can find out if students are working and have families, where they are from, how many languages they know, or how many years of formal schooling they have completed. Fees may also be collected during the intake and registration process.

The sample intake forms on pages 30 and 31 can be tailored to meet your program needs.

Students who cannot communicate in English may come to register for classes with a friend or family member who speaks English and can interpret. Giving students appropriate program information in writing will let them know when to return for classes or assessment testing. If possible, you can provide intake and assessment materials for students in their native language. Interpreter and translation services can be a benefit of a community partnership. You can tailor the sample placement card on page 32 to meet your program needs. See the sample volunteer and student intake and placement process flow chart on page 29 as a guideline for enrolling students.

Orientation

After one-on-one meetings with prospective students, it is helpful to provide a group orientation to introduce students to the various classes, teachers, and support services available at your program.

Program Content and Instruction

Determining Student Educational Needs: What and How to Teach

Needs Assessment

You can learn about your students' interests and needs by providing a list of topic areas for them to review and select so that you can ascertain what areas they would like to study. You can offer this in picture or text form. You can tailor the sample needs assessment form on page 33 to meet your program needs.

Informal and Formal Assessment

There are a variety of methods for measuring your students' current skill levels and development, and you should select those that suit your program's needs. Informal and formal assessments help identify the areas in which students need help and the subjects they want to study. These assessments can aid you in making decisions about curriculum and instruction and assist students in setting short- and long-term learning goals. Assessments can be given at the beginning, middle, and end of a program.

Informal assessments provide flexible ways to determine student needs and abilities. Such assessments can be found in the front of textbooks and used to check students' knowledge before they start their studies. You can also develop your own informal assessments to measure students' subject matter knowledge and their English language comprehension, listening, and speaking abilities. Try asking written questions about the content you will be teaching, questioning students orally, or requiring them to perform a certain task.

Formal, or standardized, assessments are those administered with standard and consistent conditions and procedures such as timing, instructions, scoring, and interpretation. Some formal assessments commonly used by adult ESL programs are the Basic English Skills Test (BEST), produced by the Center for Applied Linguistics (CAL), and the Comprehensive Adult Student Assessment Systems (CASAS), which has been approved and validated by the U.S. Department of Education and the U.S. Department of Labor. Although initially your program may not want to invest in these commercially produced standardized tests, you may want to consider using them in the future if you plan to expand your program and seek funding that requires such performance reporting.

Topics Often Included in ESL/Civics Instruction

Sample topics include:

- U.S. history and government
- Rights and responsibilities of legal permanent residents and U.S. citizens
- Information on the naturalization process
- Housing
- Childcare
- School systems
- Financial systems
- Community and home safety
- Emergencies
- Health
- Transportation

Teaching Resources

As mentioned in the National Resources section on pages 10-11, many resources are readily available for use in adult ESL and civics/citizenship programs. Many of these materials may be used free of charge. You may also want to seek out established adult education centers in your area, such as community colleges, that have already developed curricula and lesson plans that may be useful in your program. Established programs may offer recommendations for materials from commercial publishers specializing in adult education books and other materials for purchase.

Curricula and Resources

The Internet is a valuable source for identifying curricula and developing instructional plans and educational resources. Some useful resources from USCIS are listed below.

Resources from U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services

Located at uscis.gov/citizenship, the USCIS website offers a variety of free teaching resources for adult educators. Some of these materials include Welcome to the United States: A Guide for New Immigrants, available in a variety of foreign languages, Civics Flash Cards, and Learn About the United States: Quick Civics Lessons. Each of these publications can be used as a stand-alone resource for individual study or as a teaching tool in a classroom setting.

In addition, USCIS offers the Civics and Citizenship Multimedia Presentation, a 2-disc set which includes the short film A Promise of Freedom: An Introduction to U.S. History and Civics for Immigrants and the Flash® presentation Becoming a U.S. Citizen: An Overview of the Naturalization Process.

Instruction

USCIS offers lesson plans and activities located at uscis.gov/lessons with teaching strategies for beginning and seasoned ESL instructors preparing students for U.S. citizenship.

Content Standards

Standards describe the skills, knowledge, or performance that should result from effective instruction. Many states have content standards outlining specific skills, behaviors, and task performance adults should demonstrate to be successful in school, work, and the community.

Teaching Techniques

There are many methods for teaching and tutoring in ESL, civics, and citizenship. Do not be afraid to try a variety of approaches to see what works best for your program, your volunteers, and your students.

ProLiteracy Worldwide outlines several different methods to help students learn. Students should hear about the topic, see things about the topic, ask questions about the topic, discuss the topic, and do something related to the topic. Other ideas from ProLiteracy Worldwide include:

- Providing opportunities for students to identify what they want to learn.

- Working with students to set realistic short-term goals that will help them progress toward their long-term goals.

- Planning multisensory activities, such as listening to songs or practicing related vocabulary when tasting foods or going to the grocery store, library, or museum. Engaging in activities while learning related vocabulary and communication skills can help all students, especially learners unaccustomed to working with textbooks.

- Allowing students to work in pairs or groups.

- Talking about the purpose of different learning activities before you do them.

- Checking student comprehension and comfort with new material.

- Connecting students' daily lives to your instruction by using real-life materials, such as a workplace manual, an apartment lease, or a medical brochure.

- Asking students regularly about their satisfaction with their learning.

- Involving students in the development of lesson plans.

- Helping students see the progress they are making.

- Offering multiple opportunities for students to practice.

- Asking questions that encourage students to share their ideas and solve problems.

- Providing feedback throughout instruction.[3]

Learning Styles

Learning styles and learning preferences vary among individuals. Some learning styles include visual, auditory, tactile, and kinesthetic. Visual learners learn best through seeing. This includes written information, diagrams, the face and gestures of the speaker, items written on the board, charts, and video. Auditory learners learn through hearing. They understand best when they can hear lectures, participate in conversations, read aloud, or listen to recordings. Tactile learners learn through touch. They learn best when they move around and handle and manipulate objects. Kinesthetic learners learn by doing. They need hands-on activities to understand how something works or what it means. Teaching with these learning styles in mind will help you meet the various needs of your students.

Creating a Supportive Learning Environment

Teachers, tutors, and students will feel comfortable in an environment that encourages participation. Playing games and incorporating music and singing are low-stress ways to use language and have fun. Encourage students to share their ideas in class and with program administrators. You can foster student involvement by creating a student leadership council or asking students to become tutors as they progress in their language abilities. Invite students to provide feedback on the program.

While instruction will address topics and problem-solving skills that can assist students in their daily lives, tutors should not be expected to solve their students' problems. When students and families face challenges that your volunteers are unable to address, you can refer the students to community partners and social service organizations for assistance. Students also may have issues with their immigration cases. These students should be referred to an organization with Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA) accredited staff or to a licensed immigration attorney. For a list of organizations, see www.justice.gov/ eoir/legalrepresentation.htm. Your staff and volunteers should not try to counsel students on their own.

Program Development

How to Strengthen Your Program

Start-Up Costs and Sustainability

There are a variety of potential costs involved in developing and sustaining your program. Start-up costs include everything from recruiting students to purchasing furniture and teaching supplies. Sustained costs could include paying rent and utilities, purchasing equipment and supplies, and recruitment and retention efforts for both students and teachers.

Outreach

Outreach to students and volunteers can involve costs for flyers, brochures, or newsletters, whether produced in-house or by a professional printer. Professional printing can be expensive, but depending on the number of materials you want to produce, it may be a helpful option. You may also want to consider buying an advertisement in community magazines and newspapers, which could prove worthwhile for your program.

Training Volunteers

If you are unable to find an organization or individual who can provide training for your volunteer tutors, you will need to develop your own training materials and activities. This will entail writing and printing a manual, providing supplies for the trainees, locating a place for the training, and finding someone to conduct the training.

Classroom Space

If you do not have your own classroom space, you may need to pay a small fee to use space owned or leased by another organization, or ask another organization to donate space.

Teaching Materials

Many free teaching resources are available through USCIS and other entities. However, you may also want to purchase adult or family literacy workbooks from publishers specializing in adult education and family literacy.

Refreshments

Consider offering refreshments before class or during class breaks, since many students may come to your class directly from work. You may also want to provide refreshments at meetings and training sessions for volunteers.

Funding and Coordination

Although there are a variety of costs associated with providing ESL and civics/citizenship classes to adult students, there are many creative ways to finance your program. Programs that do not receive federal, state, or private funding can generate financial support through fundraising or other activities. These programs often develop relationships with local businesses that will sponsor activities by providing advertising or donating supplies. Businesses may go as far as to house your program if they feel their employees can directly benefit from it.

Starting and coordinating a volunteer program can take a lot of time and resources, so you may want to consider offering a small stipend to a volunteer who can lead these efforts. You may also want to establish partnerships with programs that offer complementary services or in-house expertise.

Fundraising

There are a variety of fundraising options you can use to help fund your ESL and civics/citizenship program. Proceeds from an event such as a fair, talent show, concert, auction, yard sale, bake sale, or car wash could be used to support your program. You may also want to ask a local business to sponsor your program by supplying funds for materials, or donating classroom space or other services. If you have experience fundraising for other purposes, you can apply it to your ESL and civics/citizenship program.

Grants

A variety of grant programs and funding opportunities exist. You can learn about federal government grant opportunities and if you are eligible to apply from grants.gov. Other organizations, such as the Foundation Center, provide resources and training on fundraising, proposal writing, and program planning. Books on grant writing and fundraising are available at local libraries and bookstores.

they are unsatisfied with the quality of the program, or volunteers leave because they do not feel prepared or supported by the program's leadership. Therefore, it is useful to examine retention rates and other measures of program performance in order to make any necessary adjustments.

Evaluating Program Performance

You will want to evaluate your program regularly. This will help you know if you are serving your students and volunteers effectively and help you know what changes you need to make. You should build in program flexibility so you can more easily adjust to the levels and needs of your students.

Measuring Program Performance

Review the objectives you set when designing the program and see how much progress you have accomplished. It is important to examine other performance indicators, such as volunteer and student attendance and overall retention. For example, dropout rates exist in both populations because adults have many demands on their time. Volunteers may get other jobs, and students may move or change shifts at work. However, sometimes students and volunteers leave because

Assessing Student Performance

You can use formal and informal assessments to measure student progress (see pages 14-15). Conducting pre-tests and post-tests will show you if students are improving their skills. You can create your own tests and administer them at both the beginning and end of a unit to determine what the students have learned. Maintaining a folder of written work or audio- or videotapes of students speaking is a great way to capture their individual progress over time.

Volunteer Input

Encourage volunteers to provide feedback on the program. You could hold volunteer meetings, establish a volunteer council, or provide a suggestion box. You can tailor the sample volunteer evaluation on pages 34-35 to meet your program needs.

Student Input

Provide an anonymous method for students to evaluate volunteers, and give feedback about what they consider effective instruction. This will enable tutors to understand student perceptions and consider student suggestions for improvement. You can tailor the sample student program evaluation on pages 36-37 to meet your program needs.

Follow-up

To assess the long-term impact of your program, try to maintain contact with students after they leave the program. Follow-up could be done through phone calls, e-mail contact, alumni events, or offering advanced English workshops or classes that may renew former students' interest in your program. Successful graduates can help motivate current and prospective students and offer a sense of satisfaction to the teachers who contributed to their success.

Volunteer and Student Recognition

It is important to thank your volunteers and to recognize your students' achievements. Consider some simple, tangible offerings to acknowledge their work, such as a certificate, pen, tote bag, or t-shirt, which local business may be willing to donate. You might present these at a social gathering or awards ceremony. Another effective way to recognize student performance is to ask current or former students to serve as program volunteers. Many former students would consider this invitation a great honor.

Partnerships

Keep in mind that partnerships and collaboration with other service providers can supply important complementary services to your program, such as childcare, housing assistance, case management, and employment training.

Good Luck!

Using these basic guidelines for starting an ESL and civics/citizenship program will put you well on your way to a successful experience for both your volunteers and your students. Enjoy the wonderful relationships you develop and the satisfaction of helping improve the lives and opportunities of those in your community.
